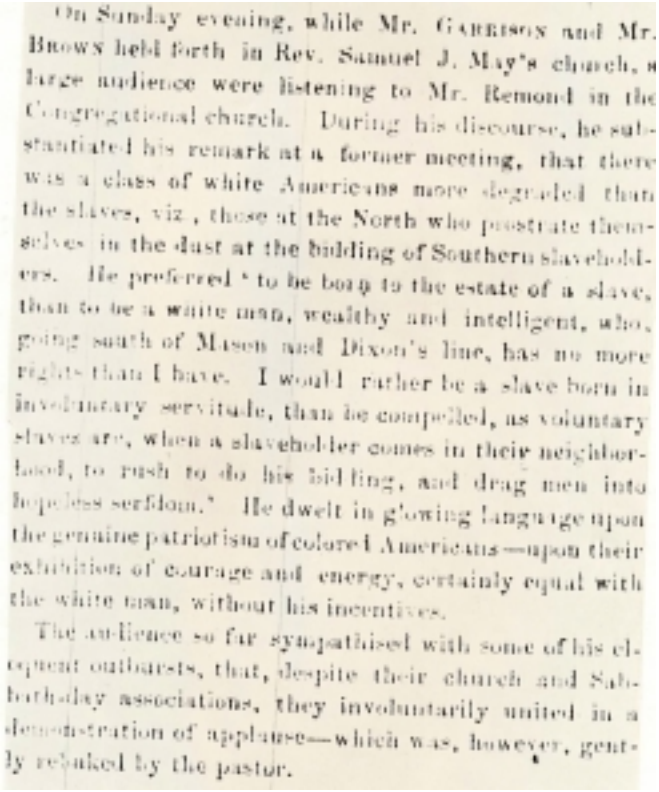
[On Sunday evening, while Mr. GARRISON and Mr. BROWN held forth in Rev. Samuel J. May's church, a large audience were listening to Mr. Remond in the Congregational church.] During his discourse, he substantiated his remark at a former meeting, that there was a class of white Americans more degraded than the slaves, viz., those at the North who prostrate themselves in the dust at the bidding of Southern slaveholders. He preferred 'to be born to the estate of a slave, than to be a white man, wealthy and intelligent, who, going south of Mason and Dixon's line, has no more rights than I have. I would rather be a slave born in involuntary servitude, than be compelled, as voluntary slaves are, when a slaveholder comes in their neighborhood, to rush to do his bidding, and drag men into hopeless serfdom.' He dwelt in glowing language upon the genuine patriotism of colored Americans—upon their exhibition of courage and energy, certainly equal with the white man, without his incentives.

The audience so far sympathized with some of his eloquent outbursts, that, despite their church and Sabbath-day associations, they involuntarily united in a demonstration of applause—which was , however, gently rebuked by the pastor.



On Sunday evening, while Mr. Garrison and Mr. Brown held forth in Rev. Samuel J. May's church, a large audience were listening to Mr. Remond in the Congregational church. During his discourse, he substantiated his remark at a former meeting, that there was a class of white Americans more degraded than the slaves, viz., those at the North who prostrate themselves in the dust at the bidding of Southern slaveholders. He preferred 'to be born to the estate of a slave, than to be a white man, wealthy and intelligent, who, going south of Mason and Dixon's line, has no more rights than I have. I would rather be a slave born in involuntary servitude, than be compelled, as voluntary slaves are, when a slaveholder comes in their neighborhood, to rush to do his bidding, and drag men into hopeless serfdom.' He dwelt in glowing language upon the genuine patriotism of colored Americans—upon their exhibition of courage and energy, certainly equal with the white man, without his incentives.

The audience so far sympathized with some of his eloquent outbursts, that, despite their church and Sabbath-day associations, they involuntarily united in a demonstration of applause—which was, however, gently rebuked by the pastor.