Mr. Bell then arose. He was much pleased with Victoria, the place and the people, but more so with the latter than the former, although he could say nothing in disparagement of Victoria: he was highly gratified with the flattering reception he had received, and his visit to Victoria, and the present opportunity of meeting his friends, would be ever treasured in his memory as one of the most pleasing episodes of his life.

He then alluded to the present position of the colored people of Victoria and their future prospects, in political, social and business aspects: he hoped they would unite upon principle on political subjects, but not so as to isolate themselves from the community, nor form party based on complexional distinctions. UNION was not isolation; let political union be for the good of their adopted country.

He then referred to the importance of newspapers and the necessity of having an organ on this coast, to advocate our rights and make known our wrongs. The PACIFIC APPEAL, although small, had exercised great influence in California, and he doubted not but its influence was felt here. He stated that he was not authorized to procure subscribers, as his visit was wholly one of pleasure, to see the country, and commune once more with a few old friends; but feeling still an interest in the PACIFIC APPEAL, he would make that one of the objects of his visit. He also said that several inquiries had been made in reference to the Anglo-African of New York; if any persons wished to subscribe for that journal, he would receive their subscriptions[.]
