Mr. Cato made an eloquent speech, in which he said he could not be regard the language of President Lincoln to the committee of colored men at Washington, as pandering to the mob spirit now rife in so many places, and in so many forms, east, west, and north. He contended that the two races can live together, and without either party cutting the other's throats. They live together without any such murderous work in England, Canada, France, the West Indies, South America, and everywhere else. Even here, it has always been so. Remove slavery, and this wicked idea would vanish before the warm breath of civilization. As to the President's colonizing us anywhere, he was bitterly opposed to it, now and always. "This," said he, "is my home—the home of my childhood and early associations, and here shall rest my ashes and the ashes of my children forever."
