Rev. CHARLES GARDINER said he did not rise to make a speech, but he could not help telling the meeting that God was with them. He saw the ministering angels hovering around them. He said that he had been travelling through the East for the last ten weeks, and that there is but one sentiment in regard to this bill—that it is in flat denial of the Republican principle. He told them in Pittsfield, and other places, that they, the colored race, should go to war with the United States, or acknowledge themselves slaves. They were sold, he said, by Daniel Webster, the veriest bloodhound in the United States, and by both houses of Congress, to the South, and I call this an infamous Union, a ‘Union cemented in blood and robbery. Yes, I say robbery, because Slavery was began by the robbery of the sons and daughters of Africa. He said that every editor in the United States skulked this bill, by hiding it from the public, and I say that they are all a set of villains. It was a secret combination, at which Daniel Webster and the editors were at the bottom of, to drive the colored people to Africa; the appropriation of three millions of dollars, was proposed for that purpose. He said he was almost disposed to cut loose altogether from the Presbyterian church. He was disgusted with the ministers of that and the other churches—they were all combined against them. He advised his brethren and sisters to be on their guard, and take the life of every man that attempted to deprive them of their liberty. He considered that liberty was the greatest and only blessing they enjoyed. He said that every colored church should be opened on the first Monday of every month and a concert of prayer held for the panting slave. He could hear them pray for everything but the poor slave, and he assured them that Slavery progressed upon them in proportion as they separated themselves from the Lord.
