

Mr. REMOND asked permission to detain the audience while he presented a fact that had recently come to his knowledge. It was known that the opposition had occupied the greater part of the time during the afternoon session. The object of these meetings was discussion, and for the purpose of defraying the expenses, which in the case of this meeting could not be less than $75, a collection had been taken up. When Mr. Samuel D. Porter, who sees eye to eye with some of the opposition, was called upon, he said he had nothing to give, and yet in a few moments he rises and proposes questions to occupy the time of the remainder of the Convention. If this was not coolness, he had yet to learn what belonged to an iceberg! He only mentioned it to show the class of mind they were forced to deal with.

Mr. R. then proceeded to argue briefly, from the standpoint of the slave, in behalf of universal freedom. He asked simply equality upon his manhood, not upon his colour. He asked the Republicans of Rochester to take their anti-slavery Constitution and go South and reclaim the young man; for whose purchase a subscription was now being circulated in this city, who was a native born citizen of the Empire State!

If those who held the anti-slavery construction of the Constitution would give him one single case in which they had made use of it to liberate a slave, he would show them a hundred where slaves had been reclaimed under that Constitution.

He could not desire to curse any man, but if it could be, he should be glad to have Samuel D. Porter, who he believed was intelligent upon the subject of slavery—which was more than he could say of Mr. Stebbins—he should like to have Mr. Porter awake to-morrow morning with his (Mr. Remond's) complexion! If that did not change his views of slavery, and an anti-slavery Constitution, nothing would.

Mr. REMOND asked permission to detain the audience while he presented a fact that had recently come to his knowledge. It was known that the opposition had occupied the greater part of the time during the afternoon session. The object of these meetings was discussion, and for the purpose of defraying the expenses, which in the case of this meeting could not be less than $75, a collection had been taken up. When Mr. Samuel D. Porter, who sees eye to eye with some of the opposition, was called upon, he said he had nothing to give, and yet in a few moments he rises and proposes questions to occupy the time of the remainder of the Convention. If this was not coolness, he had yet to learn what belonged to an iceberg! He only mentioned it to show the class of mind they were forced to deal with.

Mr. R. then proceeded to argue briefly, from the standpoint of the slave, in behalf of universal freedom. He asked simply equality upon his manhood, not upon his colour. He asked the Republicans of Rochester to take their anti-slavery Constitution and go South and reclaim the young man; for whose purchase a subscription was now being circulated in this city, who was a native born citizen of the Empire State!

If those who held the anti-slavery construction of the Constitution would give him one single case in which they had made use of it to liberate a slave, he would show them a hundred where slaves had been reclaimed under that Constitution.

He could not desire to curse any man, but if it could be, he should be glad to have Samuel D. Porter, who he believed was intelligent upon the subject of slavery—which was more than he could say of Mr. Stebbins—he should like to have Mr. Porter awake to-morrow morning with his (Mr. Remond's) complexion! If that did not change his views of slavery, and an anti-slavery Constitution, nothing would.