

[BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1860,—MR. EDITOR:—Monday last being the anniversary of the death of Capt. John Brown the heroic martyr of Harper's Ferry, the day was suitably commemorated under the auspices of the Buffalo Anti-Slavery and Fugitive Aid Association. At half past two o'clock P. M., a large and highly respectable audience assembled at the East Presbyterian Church; where a very solemn and impressive funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. James M. Williams; the pulpit on the occasion being draped in deep mourning.] The Rev. speaker in his eulogium upon the deceased, exhibited him in a clear and forcible manner as a disciple of the living God, who had studied the pages of Divine inspiration and who from the promptings of an honest heart felt it his duty to go forward in defence of Liberty. He eulogized him as one of the greatest martyrs since the days of Christ, and remarked that in one hundred years hence no tablet of gold could be found sufficiently fine upon which to write his epitath, or with which to erect a monument to his memory, and though Capt. Brown was dead, and by a convoy of bright angels had been conveyed to Abraham's bosom, yet he still lived and would continue to live as a terror to oppressors while even the dismal clank of a chain could be heard upon the limb of a single slave, in all of God's vast

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1860.—MR. EDITOR:—Monday last being the anniversary of the death of Capt. John Brown the heroic martyr of Harper's Ferry, the day was suitably commemorated under the auspices of the Buffalo Anti-Slavery and Fugitive Aid Association. At half past two o'clock P. M., a large and highly respectable audience assembled at the East Presbyterian Church; where a very solemn and impressive funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. James M. Williams; the pulpit on the occasion being draped in deep mourning. The Rev. speaker in his eulogium upon the deceased, exhibited him in a clear and forcible manner as a disciple of the living God, who had studied the pages of Divine inspiration and who from the promptings of an honest heart felt it his duty to go forward in defence of Liberty. He eulogized him as one of the greatest martyrs since the days of Christ, and remarked that in one hundred years hence no tablet of gold could be found sufficiently fine upon which to write his epitath, or with which to erect a monument to his memory, and though Capt. Brown was dead, and by a convoy of bright angels had been conveyed to Abraham's bosom, yet he still lived and would continue to live as a terror to oppressors while even the dismal clank of a chain could be heard upon the limb of a single slave, in all of God's vast domain. The Rev. gentleman in the course of his remarks also paid a tribute of respect to the memory of the gallant men, who, with Capt. Brown also shared the fate of the gallows. Speaking of them as in every way worthy of our praise and commemoration, characterizing them as joint partners under the firm of John Brown & Co. But for me to undertake to follow the speaker would be assuming more than I would be warranted in doing, and even more than I possibly could do.

domain. The Rev. gentleman in the course of his remarks also paid a tribute of respect to the memory of the gallant men, who, with Capt. Brown also shared the fate of the gallows. Speaking of them as in every way worthy of our praise and commemoration, characterizing them as joint partners under the firm of John Brown & Co. But for me to undertake to follow the speaker would be assuming more than I would be warranted in doing, and even more than I possibly could do.